#SOCIALWORKMONTH

SOCIAL WORKERS: LICENSED TO LEAD

Social work is made for times like these.

Our profession is uniquely qualified to navigate the unsteady terrain we are encountering at the interpersonal, regional, national, and international levels. Indeed, our distinctive understanding of policy and people prepares us to lead the way.

Whether we are linking clients to services, organizing people to take action, or connecting policymakers to regulatory data, social workers are bridging gaps every day and have been for generations. Today, that role seems more important than ever.

Social work interventions can lead to lasting and positive change at the micro, mezzo, and macro levels. Professional regulation recognizes that those interventions are powerful and should be practiced with care.

This month, ASWB is celebrating the power of social work with a series of social media banners that recognize and highlight the many ways that licensed social workers build bridges. In gratitude,

The role of regulation: Shaping social work's future-ready workforce

At the heart of this year's meeting are two essential questions:

- What defines a social worker in today's world?
- What role does regulation play in protecting a future-ready workforce?

We've structured the Education Meeting around those questions to ensure attendees leave empowered with new strategies to drive innovation, equity, and competence.

Join social work regulators, administrators, educators, and thought leaders to engage in two days of exploration into how regulatory concepts shape the future of social work.
